Social network sites are now the target of hackers and thieves.

Sites like Facebook have recently been hit by hackers who take control of a person's Facebook account and sends an urgent message to all their friends asking for money.

"The story was 'I'm stuck here in London. I was on vacation at a resort. We were held up at gunpoint and now I have no way to get back home. Please send money,'" Bryan Rutberg said.

Facebook says it can't afford to set up a hotline for users if your account is hacker. You have to send an email to its security team.

Experts offer these suggestions for protecting yourself:

- Have more than one contact email address -- that way you can prove you are the owner of the account
- Don't use the same password for all your web accounts and be suspicious of anyone who asks for money, even friends.
